MEETING AND EVENT SPACES

THOMPSON
SEATTLE

Since Seattle's first flying machine took to the skies over Puget Sound in 1908, the spirit of aviation has run deep through the area's history—which is why you'll find Thompson Seattle's rooms, suites and event spaces subtly infused with textures, forms and materials inspired by flight.

And, it's why our second-floor meeting rooms are named for historic planes featured at Seattle's world-renowned Museum of Flight. Blackbird, Dreamliner, Flybaby and Grasshopper range from 500 to 1300 square feet and all feature dramatic floor-to-ceiling windows for an open, airy feel.

BLACKBIRD

With its "most efficient" cruising speed of more than three times the speed of sound flying at over 85,000 feet, the now-retired Blackbird reconnaissance plane is still the fastest and highest flying air-breathing production aircraft ever built.

DREAMLINER

The distinctive swept wingtips set Boeing's most fuel-efficient airliner apart from the pack. The first major commercial airplane designed with a composite fuselage and wings, the Dreamliner features digital fly-by-wire technology and quiet, environmentally progressive operation.

GRASSHOPPER

These small, lightweight observation and liaison planes were manufactured and put into service quickly to aid the allied effort in World War II. Major General Innis Swift coined the Grasshopper nickname when he remarked to a pilot, "You looked like a damned grasshopper when you landed in those boondocks!"

FLYBABY

In 1962, the Experimental Aircraft Association put out a call for a low-cost, folding-wing plane that could be easily built, flown and towed or trailered between flights. The Flybaby was the winning entry, designed by lifelong aviation enthusiast and Seattle resident Peter Bowers, who enjoyed a distinguished career in the military and at Boeing.
